Introduction

On November 9th and 10th, 2005, Sesame Workshop convened a conference on Arabic literacy & language acquisition in early childhood. A group of twenty-one educators, researchers, and media specialists from Jordan, Israel, Egypt, Palestine, and Lebanon joined Sesame Workshop staff and representatives of Sesame Street’s Jordanian, Palestinian, Egyptian and Israeli co-production teams at the Dead Sea, Jordan, to discuss an array of issues related to the use of multi-media to promote literacy skills. In addition to their geographic diversity, the meeting participants reflected a range of professional backgrounds including: linguistics, media production, education, research, and developmental psychology. (A list of participants is included at the end of this document as Appendix B.) Following the bombings that took place in Amman on the evening of the first day of the session, all of the conference participants stayed on through the entire course of the conference (which was shortened to conclude mid-afternoon of the second day so as to accommodate participants who had changed their travel arrangements as a result of the hotel tragedy.)

Conference Objectives

Building on more than two decades of Sesame Workshop media projects in Arabic, the conference provided an opportunity to coalesce the expertise of advisors on this subject, while also serving as a unique forum for individuals from various countries to meet and share their related experiences and their challenges, projects, and plans for developing Arabic-language media interventions. During the two days of meetings, presentations, and continual discussion, the conference participants engaged in a dynamic dialogue – exchanging ideas, opinions and plans for new innovative projects and proposed partnerships. The conference succeeded in meeting its stated objectives, identifying several issues and serving as a springboard for future media-based literacy interventions.

Most specifically the conference sought to:

- Convene educational and media experts from Arabic-speaking countries
- Define and explore issues of Arabic literacy & language acquisition in early childhood
- Examine educational media materials produced by Sesame Workshop’s partners in Arabic
- Determine factors to consider when producing Arabic language media
- Brainstorm ways to use media to promote Arabic literacy

Convene educational and media experts from Arabic-speaking countries:
While the political realities of the Middle East often prevent colleagues in this field from meeting across borders, experts from Arabic-speaking countries had an opportunity during the session to meet, share information, and create possible linkages for the future. Indeed, this was the first time that any of the participants had been in a forum comprised of individuals from Lebanon, Palestine, Jordan, Egypt and Israel. By widening the scope of contact among these individuals and their respective organizations and institutions, Sesame Workshop may be better able to develop future media projects that consider the educational needs of children in diverse Middle Eastern countries while addressing universal concerns related to the promotion of Arabic literacy. The representation from Sesame Workshop's current Middle Eastern co-productions will serve to bolster the related work in each respective country, as well as build on the possibility for regional initiatives in the Middle East both within and outside of Sesame Workshop’s purview. Future projects may result from the distinctive professional cooperation initiated at this conference.

Define and explore issues of Arabic literacy & language acquisition in early childhood

The integrated components of the Sesame Workshop Production Model (research, education and production) were represented at the conference, leading to a comprehensive examination of Arabic literacy and media from a variety of complementary perspectives. Researchers shared critical information about language learning and the particular challenges that young children face in learning to read and write Arabic. Educators served to inform discussions on the resources that currently exist in Arabic for young children and to reflect on the daily reality of young children and their experience of language acquisition. Production experts, both from Sesame Workshop's co-productions and other media projects taking place in the region, played a pivotal role in exploring how these issues might best be interpreted and expressed through various forms of media.

Examine educational media materials produced by Sesame Workshop’s partners in Arabic

Sesame Workshop's library of electronic and print materials in Arabic provided concrete examples of previous attempts to address literacy throughout the region over the last twenty-five years. In addition to showcasing some of Sesame Workshop's "highlight" segments and outreach materials, Sesame Workshop, in planning for the session, had purposefully designed the collection of materials presented so as to invoke a critical analysis of the approaches, methodologies, and pedagogical tools utilized over time. The types of diversified materials demonstrated enabled the participants to reflect, respond, and propose strategies that could best address the current needs of children. Exploring Sesame Workshop materials also exposed participants to an array of media vehicles that might be adapted or implemented to foster such educational objectives. For example, several participants emphasized the importance of combing multiple media in the forms of television, print and interactive media (Internet based) so as to reinforce literacy skills and to aid in language acquisition.

Determine factors to consider when producing Arabic language media
Through plenary discussions as well as smaller working groups, participants devised lists of critical factors that literacy projects should address. These were based on the backgrounds and particular expertise of each individual, as well as the result of an active exchange of ideas. Identifying these factors is of crucial benefit to Sesame Workshop as we proceed with current and future media projects across the Middle East.

Some of the factors that emerged during the discussion included:

- The critical issue of colloquial vs. classical (which form of Arabic to use for different media outlets)
- Lack of unified terminology in the Arabic language dialects
- Reading and listening skills of parents and caregivers (decoding and comprehension)
- Weakness of educators in spelling, grammar and pronunciation
- Lack of forms of expression in the Arabic language
- Problem of rote learning in Arabic schools
- Absence of pride in and love of the Arabic language
- Lack of fostering a love of reading
- Socio-economic status of target groups
- Psycho-social educational needs
- Dearth of imagination and creativity when developing literacy based multi-media materials
- Issues of book distribution and availability in Arabic speaking countries
- Lack of relevant and child-centric content that is language based

Brainstorm ways to use media to promote Arabic literacy

A significant portion of the conference was devoted to group work aiming to explore and develop tangible new media initiatives – both in electronic and print formats – that promote Arabic literacy. While several of these proposed projects had particular relevance to the educational agenda and needs of specific countries, a list of potential projects that might cross borders in the region also emerged. Examples from this list include the following:

- Interactive television programming
- Interactive computer games
- Read along books (audio/visual)
- Internet based interactive media focused on literacy games and activities for native Arabic speakers, as well as non-native speakers, to aid in the learning process of reading and writing Arabic
- Uniform alphabet song designed to cross borders and apply to all Arabic speaking countries and regions (presented in modern standard Arabic so as to be universal)
- Multi-media and interactive-media packages used to present and reinforce literacy in written and oral forms that are applicable throughout the Arabic speaking world
In addition to the nascent ideas that resulted from the meeting, a general tone of collective work toward pursuing these goals also prevailed, paving the way for future brainstorming and for the potential implementation of new media endeavors.

The Arabic Literacy Conference was a tribute to the participants from throughout the Middle East, many of whom put aside political sensitivities in order to participate in this regional forum. The conference served to unite people during a time of protracted conflict and to become a catalyst, igniting an exciting dynamic through which the professional expertise and dedication represented has the potential to yield pioneering educational initiatives. Dr. Cairo Arafat, the Palestinian Sesame Street project's Director of Educational Content and Research and the moderator of the conference, closed the final session as follows:

"This conference is a stepping stone. Whether Sesame Workshop continues to be involved, we will generate efforts locally that can lead to these projects. We've established here the importance of dialogue on these critical issues. What's important now is our commitment to working to improve the lives of children."

The committed affirmation to working toward this aim of all those present could not have been more strongly and sincerely shared.

Sesame Workshop hopes to serve as a resource, when appropriate and possible, to help further the dialogue and cooperation initiated over the course of the conference.
